Adhesion of common oral bacteria to the enamel surface associated with a natural tooth caries lesion was evaluated. Adherent bacteria were identified and quantified using a modified scanning electron microscopy technique. Bacteria such as Streptococcus mutans, Lactobacillus casei, Lactobacillus reuteri, Lactobacillus fermentum, Lactobacillus acidophilus and Actinomyces viscosus adhered more heavily to the enamel surface associated with natural tooth caries lesion than to the enamel surface associated with natural tooth sound area. Very few bacteria adhered to the surface of the enamel associated with the artificially created caries lesion. The adhesion properties of Streptococcus mutans and Lactobacillus fermentum was more heavily influenced by the pH of the buffer solution used for the bacterial incubation. The polysaccharides and extracellular materials produced by Actinomyces viscosus contributed to the adhesion process.Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) imaging of human breast tissue. Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) imaging is a reliable technique for noninvasive, molecular investigation of tissue and cell function at the level of the cell or the nucleus. We have examined the possibility of employing FTIR imaging to delineate both normal and neoplastic human breast tissue microstructure. Tissue sections of human breast tissue were treated with heat or compounds that alter metabolic activity. The absorption spectra obtained by FTIR imaging were quantified and analyzed. Both FTIR and histology showed significantly altered morphology and chemical composition in breast tissue treated with heat. However, neither histology nor FTIR was able to detect differences between normal and malignant tissue. Treatment with the metabolic inhibitor, rotenone, resulted in a loss of tissue architecture. The absorption spectra obtained from tissues treated with rotenone showed peaks characteristic of hydroxyl/amino acid, nucleic acid, and lipid groups. Although
